Declaration History

Just after the Declaration of Independence was ratified in Philadelphia on July 4, 1776, messengers sent by the Continental Congress distributed copies to all the 13 original colonies. Rhode Island's General Assembly received theirs on July 18, 1776.

Legislators approved the Declaration and directed then Secretary of State Henry Ward to make copies for each of the 28 communities in the colony. Ironically, Solomon Southwick, an editor of The Newport Mercury who was charged with printing those copies, carried out the task on a press once owned by one of the Declaration's signers--Benjamin Franklin.

Of all the Rhode Island town copies, the West Greenwich document is among eight known to have survived.

This precious piece of our state's history nearly was lost to all when in December of 1999, Preserve Rhode Island, a historic association that unearthed the Declaration, announced intentions to sell it at the New York auction house, Christie's. But State Archivist Gwenn Stearn believed that the copy was a state record and therefore the property of the people of Rhode Island. Plans for the sale were halted and negotiations regarding the future of our state's copy of the Declaration began.

Finally, in August of 2002, Rhode Island Secretary of State Edward S. Inman, III brokered an agreement between the state of Rhode Island, the town of West Greenwich and Preserve Rhode Island. This accord called for Secretary Inman to raise $200,000 to give to Preserve Rhode Island and the town of West Greenwich, which then agreed to lease the document to the Secretary of State.

The price: one dollar a year for the next century.

On July 18, 2002, 226 years after Secretary of State Henry Ward first distributed the document to the people of the Colony of Rhode Island, Secretary of State Edward S. Inman, III will once again make the Declaration of Independence available to the people of the state of Rhode Island.

Secretary Inman's proposal makes this the only colonial-era Declaration of Independence available for public viewing in all of New England. The copy will be permanently displayed at the Heritage Harbor Museum.

Secretary Inman, as his predecessor Henry Ward did 226 years ago, is distributing copies of the Declaration to all the cities and towns to mark this historic occasion.
